

E. Tod Clark took over All Points Cooperative on May 1, taking the reins from Ed Foster who retired.

The 51-year-old managed the Farmers Coop Elevator in Hemingford before becoming All Points CEO and lived in Gothenburg from 1991 to 1996 when he worked for Farmland Industries in the feed division.

Clark oversees 150 full-time employees across the company. Part-timers, especially during the busy agronomy season, push the total to 212.

The cooperative serves the communities and surrounding areas of Amherst, Arnold, Gothenburg, Lexington, Cozad, Callaway, Eustis, Farnam, Loomis, Overton, Sumner and Westerville.

What were the overriding factors in taking the job of CEO/president of All Points Cooperative?

"My familiarity with All Points and knowing it as a progressive and financially strong company.

Also the strong foundation provided from a talented employee group to work with was a positive. Another important aspect for me was the strong and talented All Points board of directors."

After leaving Gothenburg in 1996, was it in your mind that you wanted to return someday? If so, why?

"I wouldn't say it was necessarily in a master plan but the opportunity to return when I heard of Ed Foster's pending retirement had us very interested.

After interviewing with the board of directors and then receiving an offer of employment, it was an easy decision to say yes. Teresa and I really enjoyed everything about our first time in Gothenburg and still have good friends here—the progressive community, the friendly people and the chance to lead a successful, progressive and strong cooperative like All Points made our final decision easy.

An added bonus is that our two children attend school just three hours away in Lincoln, plus we enjoy going to Husker football and basketball games."

What strengths do you bring to the job?

"I have been involved in the coop system my entire career. I started out cleaning the boot pit of an elevator during a part-time high school job and have performed many of the jobs that we do at cooperatives in serving our customers.
