The year 2013 included considerable building activity in Gothenburg, but the overall value of building permits was down for the second consecutive year.

Estimates on project costs in building permits dropped to $3,799,357 for 2013. That's down approximately $1.4 million from 2012.

While figures are down compared to 2012, the coming year already has some activity.

"We've got some things in the works," city clerk Connie Dalrymple said referring to the announced building projects by two churches as well as additional housing plans. "It's a good start to the new year."

The downtown business scene received some changes with three businesses remodeling existing structures. Two new downtown businesses filing building permits included Hecox Family Dentistry and Charm Boutique. Rickertsen Technologies, Inc., moved into an older downtown building and completely remodeled the main floor.

Storage units added by Kim Slack were another business addition.

The total value of new business permits was $345,000.

Building permits for four new single family homes were filed.

The new homes didn't make up for the six homes that were demolished during the year, though. In fact, 36 homes have been torn down in Gothenburg since 2000.

Two of the new homes are for private individuals. Two others are by contractors as part of the new Redevelopment Authority's Spec House Development Program. Additional housing starts utilizing this program are expected in 2014.

Permits on the new homes carried a total projected value of $775,000.

Permits for business alterations and remodeling dominated the year's figure. Ten projects had a total value of $1,394,500:

All Points Cooperative installed a new scale to help relieve congestion during harvest season.
